Indentured servitude was revived again in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Its earlier popularity had been lost when the Europeans had discovered African slave labor. However, with the antislave movements of the 1800s, the colonial powers were looking for a new labor force and found one among their own colonies. Sending thousands of indentured servants to the island nations and of the Caribbean and Pacific, the powers of the world saw an end to their labor problems. Yet, indentured servitude would prove no better than slavery in the end.

The antislavery movements of the 1800s, both in Europe and the Americas, had the colonial powers scrambling to find labor in their colonies. The colonial industries provided the raw materials Europe needed to keep supplying its colonies with the finished products. Indentured servitude seemed the easy and humane solution. It was not slavery (Document 1), it was an offer that the people could either accept or reject. It was supported within the colonies (Document 2), where the colonists realized they didn't have enough hands to work the sugar plantations and textile factories.

It would also appear, if documents 3 and 4 are analyzed, that the colonies who went on to supply the labor believed in the ideas behind indentured servitude as well. From India, China and Japan, thousands left their homeland as indentured servants. They left looking for a better life for themselves and their families. All three of those nations were going through rough spots in the 1800s and early 1900s. India was a colony of Great Britain and native Indians were unequal in the government's eyes and lived in poverty. China was carved up into spheres of influence by Europe and daily Chinese life was a struggle. Japan was at the mercy of the shoguns, fierce lords who had a puppet emperor and all the wealth.

So, Indians, Chinese, and Japanese let their homelands believing in the good conditions of their servitude contract (Document 7). They knew it would not be an easy life but it was free passage, 5 years of their lives and then freedom in a whole new country where they could possibly buy land of their own and provide for their family better than they could in their homeland. Not to mention they would be well taken care of while serving out their 5 years. Food and clothing given to them, a house that was to be kept in good repair by their master, medicines a doctor for the sick, all to be given them simply for 5 years of their life.

Yet, it was not that simple. A lot of masters didn’t uphold their end of the bargain promised to their servants. As Document 8 shows, employers pushed their servants. Servants for 12 hours and didn’t give them enough time to rest and eat. Their wages were insufficient to their daily work and they were Accrual days when they couldn’t work because of illness. In many ways, indentured servants were treated just as slaves were, only they willingly entered into the position whereas slaves hadn’t been given the choice.

A daily life of indentured servants involved long hours in the fields of sugar cane (Document 5) and in the blistering sun. Most of the colonies indentured servants were used in were tropical and along the Equator. The back breaking work started with sunrise and ended after dark. Those few who were placed in factories dealt with working with dangerous machinery and overseers constantly making them go faster which would have caused mistakes and possible injuries.

In the end, many perished from disease and exhaustion. Others reached their goal and were freed in five years to make their own fortunes. Some returned home, disillusioned by their 5 years of voluntary slavery and others remained as Document 9 shows, adding to their adopted country's prosperity and populations.

Indentured servitude, though not the best system of labor, provided the tropical colonies with the labor they needed and gave other oppressed colonies the chance at a new life. Perhaps other historical documents that could have been shown would have been an indentured servant's first-hand account or even an account of a servant's once they were free and entered the society of the servant's 'new' country.
In the 1800's, after the abolition of slavery in America in 1865, and Britain in 1833, cheap labor had such a high demand that a new institution was created to satisfy this demand. This institution became known as indentured servitude. Indentured servitude was a type of bondage mostly supported by the elite in wealthy countries. The less fortunate were less enthusiastic about the idea, as they were the ones who suffered. Although indentured servitude was in some ways cruel and unjust, with low pay and terrible conditions (document 7), it also provided a way to satisfy the demand for labor. This demand for cheap labor was so strong that the aristocracy went to great lengths to sustain it. The demand for labor in some places was so strong that in 1855, it was estimated that around 60,000 workers were needed to work the 160,000 acres of sugar crops (document 2). Because of this immense need, document 2 justifies the use of indentured servants. The British colonist writing the editorial in this document most likely had a biased view, as they wanted to import cheap labor to avoid paying workers higher wages. Britain in general was not very generous towards indentured servants.
they considered them “... recruits for military service,” (Document 1), written by a powerful British man as a way to justify the use of indentured servants. It shared a popular belief that indentured servants are not slaves, but proletarians that voluntarily sell themselves to make a living. Both of these documents were written by powerful, educated British men, who no doubt were biased. The demand for labour and thirst for profit surely had much to do with the creation of the institution of indentured servitude.

After the creation, the institution spread fast and furiously throughout Africa and Asia. According to Document 3, indentured migrations were largest from East Asia to South America and the Middle East to South America. The reason for the large influx to South America was most likely the large production of sugar cane, coffee, and tobacco. Another document analyzing migration is Document 4, which clearly shows that the largest immigration was from India to Suriname (455,000) and India to Suriname (239,000). China also contributed to Peru, Cuba, and Hawaii, while Japan sent servants to Peru and Hawaii. These two documents are charts, and graphs, and have no visible bias. Document 10, published by the British government, shows the changes of former slaves and Asian Indians in Mauritius, one of the most prominent areas for indentured servants. This document shows the consequences of the immigration of Asian Indians as indentured servants to the island of Mauritius. Another consequence is shown in Document 9, because of indentured migration, the majority of population in 1920-1921 in the Chandigarh was indentured servants from Asia.

Indentured servants endured back-breaking work, long hours, and low pay. Document 8 is written by an indentured servant describing such conditions. Ramana had insufficient time to eat, 15-hour work days, and an unfair master. These conditions violate the contract that Ramana probably signed (Document 7). The emigrant is not required to work on Sundays, and only required to labor seven—ten hours a day. This contract provides transportation and clothing there, but not for the return voyage. The contract is written by an educated man, who was most likely trying to pick one of the indentured servants. It was apparently not valid anyway, as the employers took advantage.

Finally,

other documents to be used to analyze indentured servitude would be first hand accounts from Asian, African and American indentured servants.

Finally, although indentured servitude provided labor, it was an unfair system, as the rich took advantage and exploited the cheap labor.

With the sequential ban of slavery worldwide, the quest to find new sources of labor became increasingly important to strong economies based on slave labor. Many such economies turned to the application of exploitation of indentured servants to help to reduce labor necessities in the Caribbean, especially during the late nineteenth; early twentieth century. The brutal working; living conditions rivaled those of the previous slave labor conditions. A fundamental shift in the primary origin of the indentured servants is the effects that the ban on slavery had on the increasing number of indentured servants.

Indentured servants during the nineteenth; twentieth centuries had a similarly poor set of working; living conditions to that of the preceding slave labor living; working conditions. Herman Melville, describes in Document 1 that indentured servants are not "voluntary immigrants" nor "slaves seized by violence," but rather that they have been recruited for service similar to "military service." As a British undersecretary, Melville obviously tries to explain that indentured servitude is better than slavery. He does not tell of the harsh conditions of servitude, but rather that the people choose to become indentured servants. The pictures illustrated in Document 5 illustrate, first, the poor living conditions of indentured servants; and then, the extreme amount of labor required from indentured servants. However, the fact that both pictures are taken to illustrate the poor conditions of indentured servitude; while, surprisingly, illustrates that perhaps not all places of indentured servitude are in these poor conditions. Document 1; Document 8 are polar opposites as Document 1 is an illustration of a British indentured servitude agreement which, of course, will make servitude more appealing to possible servants while Document 2 tells the real account of a servant in South Africa. Although, Document 2 might also have embellished the truth to make his argument of harsh treatment; conditions seem more cruel; unjust. Document 1 tells of what the British supposedly promise to its will give of indentured servants but documents, though biased, tell of a first person account of those rights being violated: exploited. The working of many areas of indentured servitude are made to sound desirable: preferable by victimizing natives but are not always followed through with. I do not make people as happy as it seems.

The ban: significant reduction of legal costs of slavery leads to the exponential increase in the number of indentured servants as their labor gradually replaces slave labor in plantations, especially in the Caribbean. Document 7 is a South African document that claims that the decrease of slave labor has caused a significant increase in work to be done; it will need no "fewer than 60,000 laborers" to be required in South Africa. This editorial makes it seem that indentured servants are a necessity and the increasing labor needs are a justification for indentured servitude labor.

It is because of this need for labor created by the abolition of slavery that caused the number of indentured servants to skyrocket during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

Document 6 illustrates that beginning in 1846, the amount of slaves 49,800 in Mauritius is replaced by nearly 66,200 indentured servants. This shows the direct correlation between the decrease in slaves yielding an increase in servants. However, because of the fact that this is a British government tally, the numbers quite possibly skewed to favor the British in the number of indentured servants: former slaves.

As Document 3 illustrates, the primary focus of African slave labor was to the Caribbean.

Doc 3 shows that most of the servants went to the same region showing that the decrease in slaves was just displaced in the region by an increase in servants. But, the fact that no specific number of indentured servants is given by the document shows that there may be bias as to the amount of servants coming from all parts of the world.

Another key aspect of the indentured servant migration to consider is that as slavery shifted to indentured servitude, the principle origin of labor shifted from Africa.

To India: South east Asia. As Document 3 shows, the two main places of servitude migration is from Malaysia to India to the Americas; to the Caribbean. The table in Document 4 illustrates the main migration points of Indian, China; Japan to mainly to the Caribbean (South America). Notice the discrepancy between Document 3 & 4 because Document 3 has Malesia as a key point of servitude labor while Doc 4 does not even mention it as a place of regard. Finally Document 4 shows the concentration of Asian Indians in various places at indentured servitude. The percentages are shown to be quite high, as high as 71%, which is probably unbelievable. To show the involvement of Asian Indians in the indentured servitude labor migrations. However, the fact that it is a compilation of "various official government records" adds to its credibility as it is not a single government's statistics. But it is seen that over the nineteenth & twentieth centuries labor pools shifted from primarily Africa to primarily East, South; Southeast Asia.

Additional documents that could be helpful are letters of Asian governments regarding tenure & increase of indentured servants taken from their countries. Also, a diary entry or personal writing of an indentured servant in the Caribbean could be helpful to show the view of indentured servants as labor conditions. So as slavery decreased, indentured servitude increased because of a need for labor which caused a different source of the labor force. A dramatic increase in the number of indentured servants while the same conditions were used as in the preceding years of slavery.
