The portrait on the right is of Constantine, while the one on the right is of a Roman Patrician. Both are political figures in the Roman tradition, yet the left was produced much earlier than the portrait on Constantine. It is a realistic depiction of an older man, accentuating his lines and wrinkles, for they were a sign of wisdom. It focuses on the realism of the figure rather than yourfiful idealistic beauty. At the end of the Roman tradition, idealism was the norm, and is shown in the portrait of Constantine. The size of the piece is also characteristic of its time, showing his power by the grand scale of the piece. Both busts employ facial expressions that reflect the political atmosphere of the time: showing concern for the people he represents, while Constantine has a wide-eyed stare of worry for his own personal safety.

The purpose of these pieces is also to highlight differences in appearance, with being used as a funerary mask allowing... for great realism, while the portrait of Constantine is a propaganda piece—using size and idealistic features to display power and strength. While both busts are of Roman political figures, the time period in which each were created dictated their appearance, giving them stark differences in style, function, and size.

Roman Scullers were generally pretty accurate in their portrayal of the human appearance, as the first work ("L") shows. The second work ("R") appears less realistic and more idealized. The portrait ("R") is most likely an emperor or person of great political importance such as Alexander the Great. It would appear that the first picture ("L") of the elder man was more realistic to show his humanity and express an emotion or personality within. This kind of work was probably for an upper class purchasing private group. The second was probably used for political propaganda as the idealization would show him to be the perfect man/leader and perhaps even show him to be god-like. The perfect features and enlarged eyes seem to show inspiration or communion with the gods making him very powerful and important. The works appear to go backward in chronological development, but that is most likely due to the idealization, artistry, and local aesthetics or perhaps a move away from traditional styles.
