The materials included in these files are intended for non-commercial use by AP teachers for course and exam preparation; permission for any other use must be sought from the Advanced Placement Program. Teachers may reproduce them, in whole or in part, in limited quantities, for face-to-face teaching purposes but may not mass distribute the materials, electronically or otherwise. These materials and any copies made of them may not be resold, and the copyright notices must be retained as they appear here. This permission does not apply to any third-party copyrights contained herein.
After the revolution, newly free Americans were greatly afraid of a centralized government that might be as oppressive as the monarchy they had just fought off. And so the Articles created a government at states. This proved to be a big problem when it came to organization nationally. There was no central leadership. The biggest problem was probably the one of commerce. The legislative branch was extremely weak and problems arose between states and interstate commerce. But Congress could do nothing to control this. The legislative branch couldn't even collect taxes. And so to solve this, the Constitution granted these powers to Congress, thereby making it the most powerful branch in an independent government. Then there was the weak executive. Afraid of a centralized rule in one person, the Articles created this position as merely honorary. It had no power. Hancock didn't even show up to accept the job when he was chosen. But, once again, the Framers of the Constitution reversed this by giving the executive such powers as commander in chief and reto, once again vesting power in the federal government. Third, under the Articles, there was no army. And when Shay's Rebellion happened, it became increasingly clear of the need for some sort of militia in order to keep peace. And so, under the Constitution, it was 30. It was Shay's Rebellion that made it immediately clear of the need for a more centralized government. And when the Framers met, they fixed these three problems by increasing the power of the federal government.

But problems still exist. Nothing is more evident in these bills unfunded mandate. And even America's own Disabilities Act was passed. States complained. The federal government was using its Supreme power to order states to do something. States did not like to be told what to do, especially... if it was something that would cost money, like providing equal access for the disabled. And what made this even worse was that the feds weren't willing to pay or even provide any funding to help the states get the done. So, do the states listen or not? It seems that any move to increase the federal government's involvement. But the states won't like it. Tension is high and in power struggles like these, it is apparent that tension between the federal and state governments will be ongoing for a long time.
A. The first attempt of a government paper from the chains of Britain was in the form of the Articles of Confederation. Like everything in its first attempt, the Articles of Confederation did possess some downfall. First, the Confederation did not possess to coin its own money, meaning that the good Confederation did not have a unified currency. Second, in the case of war, the Confederation had to rely on the militaries of each individual state to fight another of the many problems was that the Confederation did not have a judicial branch to decide squabbles among states. The Constitution sought to remedy these problems by empowering Congress the ability to tax and coin money, providing for a national army and naval force, and also a judicial branch that would decide cases.

B. Gun control - the issue of gun control has been a heated topic in recent years, especially in Congress. The majority of the public generally agrees with strict gun control. However, the National Rifle Association (NRA)
Under the Articles of Confederation, great care was taken to ensure that a strong, centralized government would not be created. A repeat of the English monarchy was very undesired. The Articles gave the states most of the power for running themselves and the federal government was given very little power. The Constitution, however, gave the federal government more power, but enabled the states to keep certain aspects of their power. The federal government could not tax the states as they would tax themselves. In the Constitution, the federal government was given the power to tax the states. Under the Articles of Confederation, there would have been a lot of disagreeing and argument between states over what was best. In the Constitution, a Congress was formed which would take ideas into consideration, but come up with a compromise.

Gun control is something which also shows tensions between decentralized and centralized power. Being such a controversial issue, many people feel the need to have stricter and more defined gun control laws. While the 2nd amendment says we have the "right to bear arms," there are many other opposing viewpoints and other powers that want to control the use of guns.